"A Rhetoric of Motives" expands the field to human ways of persuasion and identification. Persuasion, as Burke sees it, 'ranges from the bluntest quest of advantage, as in sales promotion or propaganda, through courtship, social etiquette, education, and the sermon, to a 'pure' form that delights in the process of appeal for itself alone, without ulterior purpose.

Quick Summary: Rhetoric of Motives continues Burke’s earlier arguments about dramatism is that he attempts to show how rhetoric exists within literature that is not purposely intending to persuade. Instead of simply seeing literature as poetic, it should also be seen as rhetoric, particularly in terms of identification.
